15 seconds · 30 seconds · 1 minute · 2 minutes Scripted starting points for every context

Each pitch is self-contained — the 15-second version does not assume the listener will hear the 2-minute version. Adapt the language to your voice and your district. These are starting points, not scripts. Use with the Attack-Answer Companion: the pitches establish the positive case; that document handles what comes after.

PASSING INTRODUCTION · NAME TAG CONVERSATION · COLD OPEN

This country built something remarkable and we've spent forty years taking it apart. I'm running on a specific plan to rebuild it — not a slogan, a governing blueprint. It's called the American Renewal Agenda.

"Specific plan to rebuild it" is the phrase that earns a follow-up question — land it.

ELEVATOR · EVENT INTRODUCTION · CLOSING A BRIEF CONVERSATION

The United States built a broad middle class, public institutions that worked, and a basic social contract that said if you contribute, you can build a life. That system has been methodically dismantled — and neither party has offered a real plan to restore it. I'm running on the American Renewal Agenda. Not a mood. A plan.

DOOR KNOCK · TOWN HALL · RADIO SPOT · BRIEF INTERVIEW

The United States built something remarkable — a broad middle class, public institutions that kept concentrated power in check, and a basic social contract that said if you work hard, you can afford a life. That system has been methodically weakened. Not by accident. By people who found it more profitable to capture government than to compete within it. The result is a country where the cost of healthcare, childcare, housing, and education keeps rising while wages don't keep up. Where the institutions that used to protect ordinary people have been hollowed out. And where neither major party has offered a coherent plan to reverse it. I'm running on the American Renewal Agenda — a specific, sequenced governing plan built around the public interest. Not a reaction. A blueprint. Built to work.

Three paragraphs: what was built, what happened to it, the answer. Keep the third short — it lands harder that way.

The United States built something remarkable. A governing system, a broad middle class, and public institutions capable of keeping concentrated power in check. That wasn't luck — it was the result of deliberate choices made over decades. And it worked. Not perfectly, and not for everyone equally. But it worked well enough that most Americans could build a life, absorb a setback, and expect that their children would do better than they did. That system has been methodically weakened. By interests that found it more profitable to capture government than compete within it. By a political consensus that said the market would solve what public institutions used to guarantee. The result is visible in every household — healthcare that costs more than a mortgage payment, childcare that prices parents out of the workforce, housing that working people can no longer afford to buy. These aren't accidents. They're the predictable outcome of policy written for shareholders, not citizens. Project 2025 is a detailed plan for finishing the dismantling. The American Renewal Agenda is the answer — equally specific, equally serious, built around the public interest rather than against it. Sixty-five proposals across every major policy area. Twelve bills already drafted. A clear sequence from the first term through the next generation. What I'm asking people to consider is this: the dysfunction we're living with is not inevitable. It was built. And what was built can be rebuilt. That's not idealism — that's the historical record. Every major expansion of opportunity in this country came from a specific governing vision, carried by people who refused to accept that the current arrangement was permanent. This is that vision. It's specific. It's sequenced. It's ready. And it's built to work.

Five paragraphs: what was built, what happened, the contrast and the plan, the historical argument, the close. Paragraph four is the emotional core — don't rush it.
